Lately our TV has been showing Greenpeace and Neil Young protesting the oil business. To me they are a bunch of dishonest publicity seekers. Does anyone really think that the smog over Los Angeles and Beijing will disappear if the Russians don't drill or if the oil sands are shut down ?

The oil business is a business of supply and demand. If there were no demand the supply would soon stop. Greenpeace and Neil Young know this but that would mean protesting gas guzzling limos and wasteful motor sports, not to mention John Doe commuting to work. That of course would dry up their funding in short order.

Neil Young further allies himself with the Indians in an expensive lawsuit that will go on forever and accomplish nothing. I will have more to say about the Indian question in another later rant.

It seems to me that with the emerging motor traffic in Asia and the increasing air travel we will not soon reduce the insatiable demand for petroleum products. Let us hope that science and industry will eventually find way to a more efficient fuel.

George Does Some Small Town Banking

George has lived in many places, most were cities. He knew what it was like to be a number in a computer or on a file folder. Since he moved to his current town he was rediscovering what it meant to be a person in the eyes of those with whom he did business. Even if the proprietor did not know his name, he always received a greeting that acknowledged he was not a stranger. When it came to banking in his town, George found this to be especially true.

When living in the big city, George had banked with not only the same bank but the same branch for decades. Yet each time he entered his branch there never seemed to be any hint that he was known and he was certainly not known by name. Shortly after George moved to his small town he decided he should bank where he lived. He set up an account at the local Credit Union. Of course the service he received on his first visit was friendly and helpful but George thought it a simple case of good business practice. It wasn't until George went back into the bank that he fully realized there was something truly different. As George waited briefly for an available teller he enjoyed watching the neighborly exchange of conversation between the staff and the other customers. They used names and asked about family and events. It seemed to George that they actually knew each other. "Well," thought George, "that customer is older and has probably lived here their whole life. Maybe twenty years from now it will be like that for me too." Soon it was George's turn. He approached the teller and before he could say a word he heard his name. For a moment he was confused and looked behind him to see if possibly there was someone else the lady behind the counter could be talking to. No, clearly she had addressed him with his very own name. He happily chatted about this and that while his request was being processed then walked out of the building feeling a little more human somehow.

George's belief that small town banking was different from elsewhere was reinforced time and time again. When he accidentally wrote a cheque on the wrong account he actually received a phone call giving him the opportunity to shuffle some funds around rather than the default NSF fees he had received from his big city bank. One day he arrived at the branch to deposit a cheque and found a new teller behind the counter. Coincidentally that day he had also forgotten his wallet and had no I.D. or card corresponding to the account. The new teller was a little hesitant to proceed without bank card or I.D. but when asked if anyone at the bank knew him, all four of the staff in the room at the time identified him by name.

Beyond the bank's efforts towards personal service, George also has noticed they excel in community involvement. They not only regularly sponsor events or projects but are not shy about rolling up their sleeves and providing volunteers. Rumor has it they serve up a mean flapjack when it's their turn to help out with pancake breakfast.

There is no doubt in George's mind that his town's bank goes above and beyond to treat customers like neighbors and people worth taking time for. It is not an attitude George had found often in the big city. This philosophy is one more thing that makes small town rural living special, and one more thing for which to be thankful.
